One curious feature of the love of sweets is the way in which it declines with age. There seems to be no reason for this. We still go on eating, and loving the pleasure of the palate, but I imagine that half the confectioners would go out of business if no one under thirty were allowed to eat sweets. There are a hundred greedy sweet-eaters under the age of thirty for one above it. You seldom see a middle-aged man peering with a rapt expression into a confectioner's window. His eyes may goggle before a cake shop, especially in France, but he seldom gazes at a sweet shop as if a vision of Heaven had been spread before him. Indifferent to sweets as I am, I know a man of my age who can eat chocolates even while he is drinking whisky and soda. Women, too nibble sweets after dinner But they do not get really excited about them as the young do. I do not know a single woman who would shout with joy if you offered her a sugar mouse. The sight of a chocolate Easter egg with a sugar hen sitting on it does not send the adult into raptures. Pass round a bagful of acid drops among your friends and see how many of them will thank you.

- What reason does the author give for the decline of the love of sweets with age?
- What consequences does the author imagine if people below thirty were not allowed to eat sweets?
- How does the author illustrate that some people still retain the love of sweets in their old age?
